Towards a Flame Embedding Model for Turbulent Combustion Simulation

Abstract

Combustion in turbulent flows may take the form of a "thin" flame supported around critical structures. For this regime, the flame embedding approximation to the single-scale problem of the "thick" reacting flow is made possible by describing the flame surface as a mixture of d curved filaments, each representing the local impact of curvature on flame interactions. An analytically derived laminar flame velocity, based on a boundary layer approximation of combustion in a flame sheet, is used to model the flame. In general, an embedded flame model. To validate the concept, the embedded flame model is applied to a turbulent flame structure. To validate the concept, the embedded flame model is applied to a turbulent flame structure. To validate the concept, the embedded flame model is applied to a turbulent flame structure. To validate the concept, the embedded flame model is applied to a turbulent flame structure.

Introduction

Numerical simulation of turbulent reacting flows is a computationally expensive undertaking, posing the challenge of adapting the turbulent reacting Navier-Stokes equations to a multi-scale problem. This paper presents a multi-scale model of turbulent reacting flows. This paper presents a multi-scale model of turbulent reacting flows.
