Investigation into the factor of light and dark affecting woodlice

Predictions

It was expected that a woodlice would prefer a dark, dark, but not too dark, environment. Normally one would expect to find them under logs or stones etc. in such places. Under these logs etc., the air is more moist than elsewhere. It is darker, damper and cooler than the surroundings. However, in winter we do not see woodlice crawling around very often, and, also at night, it may actually be warmer under such objects, because it loses heat more slowly, so I predict that the woodlice would prefer a dark, damp and a temperature of around 10°C. (The ground temperature at a typical British day). This preference could be done experimentally in a dark box or woodlice could be used to measure light. A woodlice, if exposed to light for too long, can die due to the excessive loss of water. They prefer a moderate temperature, because they are so small and are damaged by heat if they are exposed to the extremes of heat, but they don't want such a high temperature, either, because they would not be able to survive. I would also expect the woodlice to prefer a surrounding of high humidity (around 100% relative humidity), because water vapour is more likely to be present under a high pressure. However, this is not investigated in this experiment due to the nature of the chosen chamber.

Equipment/Apparatus

10 woodlice, a choice chamber, a piece of mullin net, water, lens (to probe for water).

Variables

There are three main experiments in this report and the variables and constants are:

No.	Variable	Constant
1	The humidity of the air	The temperature of the surroundings The humidity The time allowed for woodlice to settle The number of woodlice
2	The temperature of the air	The humidity of the air The humidity The time allowed for woodlice to settle
