Context	With approximately 143 million cases and 803,000 estimated deaths reported globally in 2009, malaria is one of the most severe infectious diseases, primarily affecting the world's most disadvantaged populations. Of the four typically recognized Plasmodium species causing disease in humans, Plasmodium falciparum causes most mortality, mainly in children below the age of 5, and Plasmodium vivax most morbidity, additionally representing a reservoir of latent infection that hampers current control and future elimination efforts. No new class of antimalarials has been introduced into clinical practice since 1998, because of the technical difficulties in discovering and developing new antimalarials, as well as a relative lack of public and private resource commitment towards antimalarial research. Today, the last class of widely efficacious drugs, the artemisinins, is being compromised by the

1. Introduction

The languages of the East Bodish branch of Tibeto-Burman remain amongst some of the least documented within the family. Languages of Arunachal Pradesh, in particular those of the western portion of the state, likewise remain almost utterly undescribed. These facts are compounded by the difficulty in travelling to the regions in which East Bodish languages are spoken (Bhutan, Arunachal Pradesh, Tibet) and the near impossibility of gaining government permission for the research. This article endeavours to contribute to these descriptive deficiencies by outlining some phonological and morphological aspects of Dakpa (Tawang Monpa, aka Northern Monpa), spoken in Tawang district, Arunachal Pradesh, India, based on data we collected while there in 2007. As it seems unlikely any further work will be done on Dakpa in the near future, in this article we aim to bring into light what little data and analyses we have.

<sup>1</sup> We are grateful first and foremost to Thupten Tsering, Thupten Norbu, Lopen Gaden Norbu, Pema Gonbu, and the Tawang Language Officer Ngawang Lamsang, for their assistance and for sharing their language with us. Work on Tawang Monpa initially began with Rob Butler, Marina Mazonson and Boyd Michailovsky in February 2007. Of course, we retain responsibility for any errors in this article.
